He delivered 13,000 babies: He's delivering more with his second heart

He celebrated the first anniversary by going to Mass. He celebrated by inviting a few loved ones to breakfast. Nothing fancy or loud for Dr. Keith Vrbicky in late September, on the one-year anniversary of the day he got a new heart. Just a quiet thanks for this second chance at life.

"A very special time," Vrbicky said.

He hopes, someday soon, to celebrate with people he considers truly special guests: The Nebraska Medicine heart transplant team and cardiovascular unit who cared for him during his life-and-death struggle, and then gave him that new heart.

For the 68-year-old Vrbicky, a Norfolk obstetrician-gynecologist who's delivered more than 13,000 babies, living with a pre-owned heart is a gift even though it doesn't even come with a limited lifetime warranty.

There's no such thing as a typical heart transplant story. When this physician who practiced what he preached by biking, walking, playing his trumpet and eating right developed fatigue in early September 2021, he got himself checked out. Tests revealed a shocking diagnosis: acute heart failure. Surprise turned to fear when within weeks a transplant became his last resort. His case became one for the medical journals.

The culprit: giant cell myocarditis, a rare cardiac disorder.

Soon after being hospitalized he was put on a machine to pump his blood and help his heart and lungs.

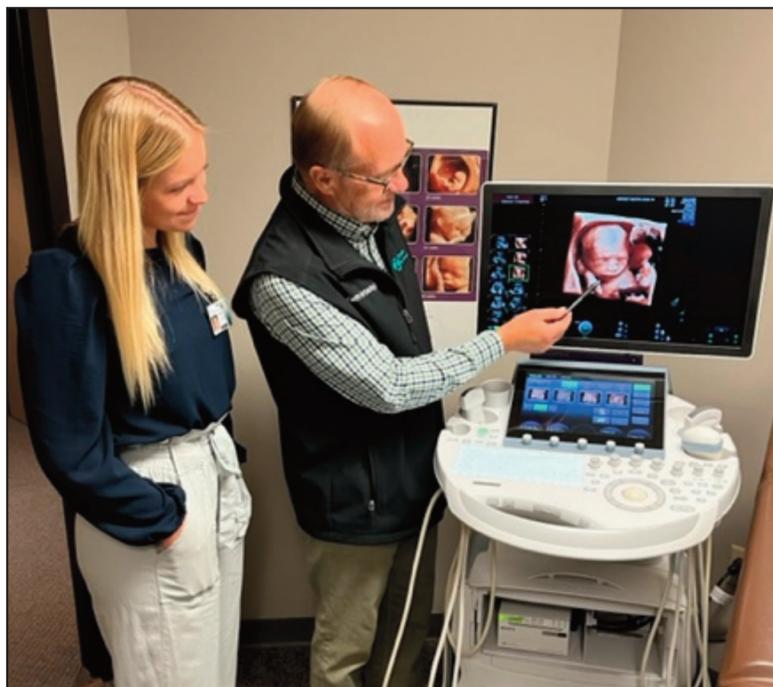

Doctors fought to keep his other organs from failing. Finally, he was stabilized enough to be listed for transplant.

For the transplant to happen, a match needed to be found within 48 hours. A heart that matched was procured after only 12.

Then came the hours-long surgery that started late September 24 and ended the next morning. After days in intensive care, Vrbicky had suffered muscle atrophy and lost 25 pounds. He needed a host of pain and anti-rejection drugs.

In the course of that first post-transplant week he went from not being able to get out of bed without aid to getting himself up on his own two feet. He started taking steps with a harness, a walker and a physical therapist by his side. Then he made it around the nurses' station and back unassisted. Then he climbed a short set of stairs, and stood alone in a shower for the first time. The anticipation of resuming his life and his practice drove him.

He returned home in early November. For months his vitals were closely monitored. He made frequent doctor visits. Progress proved slow but steady.

He gained muscle strength. He gained endurance. He began to be able to stay up later than 8 p.m. if he felt like it.

Living with someone's else's heart, he said, "is very humbling."

"Every day I pray for the donor and their family," he said. "I thank them and God that for some reason this little miracle happened that I could get a heart so fast when I needed it to stay alive. I don't take it for granted one second of any day."

He follows the same Mediterranean diet as he did before his heart transplant, eating whole grains, extra virgin olive oil, fruits, vegetables, beans, nuts and seafood.

To build his stamina he rides his bicycle every day and takes two-mile walks. He lifts weights to maintain upper body strength.

Karyn Vrbicky, his wife of 44 years and the mother of their six adult children, often joins him on his walks. She observes that from day one he's been highly motivated to get better.

"His biggest fear was that they were going to tell him he couldn't do any more deliveries or surgeries," she said, "because he feels his purpose on this Earth is to help people."

"He worried what he would do with himself if he couldn't do his calling anymore. He was driven...to get back to helping people and taking care of his patients. He was like, 'I'm not done yet.'"

Only four months after Dr. Vrbicky got a new heart, he returned to practicing medicine.

Many early patient encounters started with hugs and tears. Patients told him that they had prayed for his recovery. His staff wore matching heart transplant T-shirts and supported him in ways big and small.

At first Vrbicky worked part-time. He's now back at a nearly full slate. That means an average of 26 deliveries per month of babies that come at all hours of the day or night.

Earlier this month he passed a comprehensive, two-day transplant check up at the Med Center.

He believes he couldn't have come this far without the right mindset. "Our psychological, emotional well-being have a tremendous amount of healing power if we approach things in the right state of mind," he said.

The family's post-transplant celebrations of Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's and Easter took on more meaning than usual. "There was lots of crying," he said.

The recent marriage of his youngest child, Michaela, reminded him
